Susan Burnstine is an award-winning fine-art photographer represented by galleries around the world and widely published. See Irish Times, Saturday June 23rd. There are also others who have set up art sales as either a hobby or as an idea that came to them in a sudden moment of clarity but without any research or knowledge of what is required for such a business.

The focus of the exhibition was the role that the viewer can play in imaginative. The project not only engaged with the culture of academic knowledge production within which research functions, but also teased and unravelled such structures, testing the boundaries of this regime of knowledge when pressed up against concepts of social and legal production.
